Elmira Grotesque & Loom | sans family.

SPECIMEN.

Elmira is a sans-serif type family that explores the idea of a grotesque translated into a woven system. It began as my final project at Typemedia and has since grown into a much broader typographic system. The family draws from the processes of industrial weaving, investigating how letterforms—particularly sans typefaces—might behave when translated through power looms.

It brings together two parallel styles: a functional sans and its corresponding Loom versions, which mirror the same structure and proportions. These styles are interdependent, influencing one another while sharing core design decisions to maintain a cohesive structure. Inspired by textile labels, the family incorporates both horizontal and vertical weave directions, as well as front and back textures commonly found in woven tags. Together, these elements create a typeface that operates both as a display system and as a versatile sans for small text typesetting.

The family currently includes thirty fonts organized into two main frameworks: Sans and Looms. The sans grotesque is designed for smaller text settings, while the Looms styles are intended for display use. The Looms are based on common weaving units found in woven type in textile labels—05, 09, and 13 units tall. Each unit is developed across the two primary weaving directions, vertical and horizontal. Within each direction, styles are split into front and back layers, alongside a combined version that “weaves” them together as a layered color font.

Overall, Elmira is a versatile family that can function cohesively or as separate voices. The Looms display styles, in particular, are designed to be paired, juxtaposed, or layered, offering a wide range of expressive possibilities for the user.
So... in short, Elmira works well in big, medium or small sizes, but CAUTION: “weave it with love and very, very carefully!” ;).

"The eternal loom spins the immaculate word. The word forms the pulp and sinew of innocence. A newborn cries as the cord is severed, seeming to extinguish memory of the miraculous. Thus we are condemned to stagger rootless upon the earth in search for our fingerprint on the cosmos." Patti Smith reflects on William Blake, "The Tyger".

In Greek mythology was a weaver who challenged Athena and was consequently transformed into a spider.
( Arachne Infuriates Athena )
One version has it that Athena was a shepherd's daughter that was particularly skilled at weaving.
Boasting about her skill, she infuriated Athena, who appeared and contested her.
in which the gods
punished those humans that considered themselves equal to gods and committed hubris. Arachne, on the other hand, weaved scenes in which gods abused
humans.
the goddess more angered due to what the weaving depicted, threw Medea's potion onto Arachne.

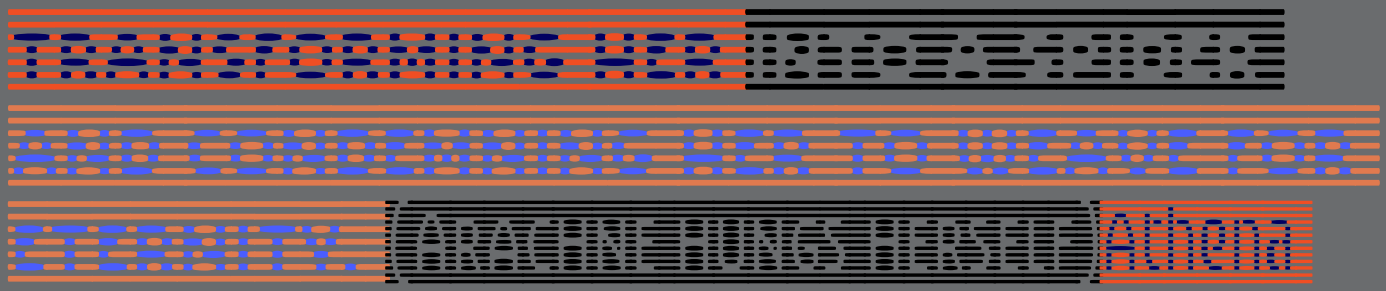
Transforming Her



Arachne weaved the contest between herself and Athena over who the patroness of Athens would be. Arachne did not respect the gods and refused to give immortal women. Athena respected how skilled Arachne was, but wanted to teach her to be more humble and respect the gods. Touching Arachne's forehead, the woman was filled with shame and hung herself. Athena brought her back to life and turned her into a spider, to let her weave forever.

Arachne loses Zeus was the judge in the contest between Arachne and Athena. The loser would not be allowed to touch a spindle or loom ever again. Athena won and out of pity transformed Arachne into a spider so she could continue weaving, without breaking the oath made to Zeus.

These alternate bracket forms are designed to evoke the feeling of woven text. They can be used to build textures and patterns, offering variations that integrate seamlessly across each of the Loom styles. Their shapes echo the logic of interlocking threads, reinforcing the relationship between text and textile.

Future updates will introduce dedicated pattern styles, allowing these characters to expand and evolve. This will give designers greater freedom to compose their own typographic, knitted textures.

Elmira Sans | v 0.4

Elmira is a sans-serif type family that explores the idea of a grotesque translated into a woven system. It brings together two parallel styles: a functional sans and its corresponding Loom versions, which mirror the same structure and proportions. Inspired by textile labels, the family includes both horizontal and vertical weave directions, as well as front and back textures commonly found in woven tags. Together, these elements create a typeface that operates both as a display system and as a versatile sans for small text typesetting.

The Loom styles are intended primarily for large-scale use—headings, packaging, posters, titles, and short, emphasized text. They are particularly well suited for building typographic textures and patterns. While carefully drawn and fine-tuned to interlock front and back structures at larger sizes, they can also perform and be very legible at very small type sizes, as is often the case with modular systems.

These recommendations are intended as general guidelines. Specific uses may require different approaches depending on the design context, and testing within the intended environment is always encouraged.

Negative tracking is not recommended for the Loom styles, especially the COLOR and Back. The glyphs are constructed and spaced to interact closely and interlock, often touching or overlapping. Applying negative tracking may disrupt these transitions and compromise the intended structure and legibility.

Elmira is an evolving project. If you encounter any refinement needed, characters missing, support needed: feedback is welcome and can be incorporated into future updates. Also if you need a custom version for your projects get in touch.
